S, s, indecl. n. or f. I. The nineteenth letter of the Latin alphabet, corresponding in form to the old Greek S for Σ. II. As an initial and medial s has a hard sound, and is therefore joined only with the tenues (c, p, t).— As a medial, also written double after long vowels: caussa, cassus, divisiones (so wrote, for instance, Cicero and Virgil, acc. to Quint.). III. As a final, s has a softer sound, and therefore not only admitted the medial b before it (plebs, urbs, abs; Arabs, chalybs, etc.), but often entirely disappeared.
So in the ante-classic poets down to the early years of Cicero (and also in his own poem, entitled Aratus, written in his youth), before words beginning with a consonant, to avoid position: Ratu' Romulus, Fulvii' Nobilior, gravi' Terra, est sati' bella, Hyperion' cursum, Virgine' nam sibi, etc.; less freq.
before words beginning with a vowel, in which case, to avoid hiatus, the vowel before s was also elided; vas' argenteis for vasis argenteus.—Final s is also elided (and the preceding vowel either dropped with it or weakened) in the forms sat from satis; mage from magis: in the neut. forms of adjectives of the 3d declension, acre, agreste, facile; in the collateral forms of the 2d Pers. Sing. Pass., fateri, fatebare, etc.: in the Gen.
Sing. of the 1st, 2d, and 5th declension, and in the Nom. Plur. of the 1st and 2d declension (aurat for aura-is, analog. to regis, etc.).—Lastly, s disappears in the forms, abin', scin', viden', satin', from abisne, scisne, vid-esne, satisne, etc. IV. S appears as an equivalent for the aspirate in many words of Greek origin; semi-, serpo, ser, super, corresp. to σμι-, ἑρπω-, ἑ-, ὑπερ-, etc.—It is also prefixed to some words obtained from Greek originals which take the soft breathing: si (old form sei), sero, Segesta, corresp. to εἰ, ἑρσι (whence εἶρω), ἑγέρτα.—Less freq. in radical words beginning with a consonant: sculpo corresp. to γαλψω; scribo, to γράφω.—To soften the termination, s appears in abs = ab, and ex corresp. to ἐκ.—Sometimes, on the contrary, an initial s appears in Greek, where the corresponding Latin word has not taken the s: Lat. fallo, Gr. σφάλω. V. S is interchanged:

A. Most freq. with r; see that letter, no. II.—B. With d: Claudius, from the Sabine Clausus; and, on the other hand, rosa, corresp. to the Gr. ῥόδον.
—C. With t: tensus and lentus; resina corresp. to ῥηῖν; and, on the contrary, merlare, pullare, for mersare, pulsare. VI. S is assimilated before f in the compounds of dis: differo, difficilis, diffuso, etc.; v. 3. dis.—On the other hand, it arises by assimilation from d, in assum, assumo, cessi, for adsum, adsumo, ced-si; from t in passus, from fateri; from b in jussi, from jubee; from m in pressi, from preno; from r in gessi, from gero; and dossarius, from dorsum. VII. As an abbreviation, S denotes sacrum, semis, sibi, suis; S. C., senatusconsultum;
S. P., sua pecunia; S. P. Q. R., Senatus Populusque Romanus, etc.

T, t, indecl. n. or f. The twentieth letter of the Latin alphabet: I. As an initial, it is, in pure Latin words, followed by no other consonant than r: traho, tremo; the combinations tl and tm are found only in words borrowed from the Greek: Tlepolemus, tmesis, Tmolus. Hence an initial t before l is rejected: lātus (Part. of fero) for tātus; and even when softened by a sibilant, the combination of t and l in stlata (genus navis), stlembus (gravis, tardus), stlita, stlocus, was avoided in the best period of the language, and, with the exception of Law lang., which retained stlitibus judicandis, the forms is, locus remained the only ones in use. II. T is interchanged with c, d, and s; see these letters. III. T is assimilated to s in quatio, quassi; fateor, fassus; mitto, missus.—It is wholly suppressed before s in usus, from utor; also in many nominatives of the third declension ending in s: civitas (theme CIVITAT, Gen., civitatis), quies (QUIET, quietis), and likewise in flexi, flexus, from flecto; and in other like forms. V

V, v, n. indecl., or f., the twenty-second letter of the Latin alphabet. The character is derived from the Greek Υ. Although it was originally written with the same sign as the vowel u, it was by the ancients themselves considered as essentially different from it. I. In sound V corresponds to the Æolic digamma; hence, it is called, in Quintilian, Æolica litera. By this affinity of the v to the digamma is explained the frequent occurrence of an initial or medial v in Latin words whose Greek equivalents have an initial or medial vowel; cf., ver, ἦρ, vis, is; levis, λεῖος. II. V has the closest affinity to the vowel u, and hence, in the course of composition and inflection, it often passed into the latter: solvo, solum, caveo, cautum, etc. III. V as a medial between two vowels was frequently elided, and the word underwent a greater or less contraction: amavisti, amāsti; novisti, nōsti; si vis, is. IV. The designation of the number five by the letter V does not strictly belong here, it being rather a representation of the half of X.

Less frequently x has arisen from the combinations ps and ts: proximus for prop-sinus (from prope), nixus for nit-sus (from nitor), the latter being used along with the collateral form nissus, as also connixi with conmixi, and mistus (from miscuo) with mixtus. An exchange of the sounds ss, or s and x, took place in axis also assis, laxus also lassus.

Y, y, n. indecl. or f. A Greek letter (the twenty-fourth of the Latin Alphabet), which was introduced only at a late period into the Latin orthography for words borrowed from the Gr.:—the place of the Gr. Y being previously filled by U. Thus, according to the express testimony of Cicero, Ennius always wrote Burrus for Pyrrhus, and Bruges for Phryges; and so the borrowed words belonging to the oldest period of the formation of the language have either constantly preserved u for the Greek υ, as cubus from κύβος, mus from μῦς, etc.; or this u has afterwards changed into i, as lacrima, formerly lacruma, from δάκρυμα. Sometimes, also, o took the place of the υ, as sorex from ὕραξ, folium from φύλλον, and, shortening a long vowel, ancora from ἄγκυρα, like the preceding lacrima from δάκρυμα. In Cicero's time y seems to have been already in use; but its application was restricted to foreign words, and hence the spellings Sylla, Tybris, pyrum, satyra, etc., are to be rejected.
